

Cheryl was raised in a middle class, suburban home. She married and had children, but some friends persuaded her to use drugs, and eventually Cheryl found herself doing "things I never in my life imagined I would do" in order to get the drugs. She has lost custody of her children to the child welfare system. Cheryl is in treatment and working at getting into recovery, and working to regain custody of her children. She has lots of hope, but is still struggling at this holiday season.

Haymarket Center's Childcare Center provides a safe, healthy and developmental environment for Cheryl's children and allows Cheryl to focus on her treatment and recovery.
